What is networking and why should you be concerned about networking with people from your Indiana Law alma mater? If networking doesn’t come naturally to you or seems like a “foreign” concept, we will help you develop these essential skills. Learn more at this presentation by Dean Andrea Havill (external affairs and alumni relations, law school) and Maarten Bout (development—international advancement, Indiana University). (Attendance is required for Professional Development Certificate.) Room 213, noon.

Center for Constitutional Democracy Speaker: Rick Welch

This presentation will describe Rick’s recent experience in Iraq from June 2018 through July 2019 as country manager for the United States Institute of Peace, implementing peace-building and conflict-resolution programs throughout Iraq aimed at resolving tribal conflicts and reforming tribal practices that destabilize communities and erode rule of law and state institutions; assisting return of and protection of minority communities post-ISIS; leading community reconciliation and strengthening social cohesion; preventing radicalization of conflict-affected women and youth through community reintegration; increasing capacity of minority communities to advocate for better representation and good governance in local, provincial, and national institutions; and building capacity in government and non-government organizations to effectively identify issues, develop solutions, and implement programs that prevent violent conflict within communities or among ethno-religious groups.

It is the aim of the presentation to demonstrate the inherent and close interconnection between peace-building and conflict resolution in deeply-divided societies and effective constitutional and institutional design. Likewise, the presentation will show the challenges presented to peace-building and conflict resolution efforts in deeply-divided societies that are created, or at least exacerbated, by weak, inept or corrupt institutions, a flawed constitution, and weak or selective enforcement of law. CCD Conference Room, Henderson House, noon.
