The right of self-determination under international law—that is, the right of a people to decide their own place in the international order—is central to many pressing issues of international law and relations today, from the rights of Indigenous peoples to the Russian war on Ukraine. Justice Kirby will discuss the concept of self-determination and its relevance to these issues. Does the concept apply to Indigenous peoples living in a country that is party to the United Nations? Does it apply in the Russo-Ukrainian War in the Donbas region of Ukraine, where the Russian-speaking people have allegedly been denied the right to determine their national territory? There are few more central concepts of international law shaping world events today.

A reception in the Faculty Lounge will follow the lecture.
