FOREIGN NATIONS, CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

*Austen Parrish

INTRODUCTION

Some of the more pressing issues related to global governance and world order lie at the intersection of foreign relations law, international law, and constitutional law. What role does the Constitution play in ensuring the United States lives up to the nation's international law obligations in an evolving period of globalization? More provocatively, to what degree will the United States uphold its international legal obligations if not mandated by the Constitution? And what role do domestic courts play in enforcing these international law obligations? In this regard, the U.S. Supreme Court has not directly addressed the question of the rights, if any, that foreign states have under the U.S. Constitution.

Into this mix comes Professor Ingrid Wuerth's article, The Due Process and Other Constitutional Rights of Foreign Nations.¹ With a textual and historical bent to her analysis, Professor Wuerth's core claim is that foreign states and state-owned enterprises are entitled to some litigation-related constitutional protections emanating from separation of powers and the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, independent and separate from any legislative protections, such as those provided under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. In so doing, she invokes Founding-era history to launch a broadside re-examination of prevailing understandings. In this way, her article serves as the opposing bookend to a well-regarded article by Professor Lori Damrosch from the 1980s (and earlier statements from Professor Louis Henkin in the 1970s) that took a different view.² She also contributes to a growing body of literature that more fully examines the role that domestic institutions play in global governance.³ On the one hand, Professor Wuerth's article underscores how much the structural features of international law are baked into our Constitution. What distinguishes her position from the prior work of others is how she embraces older case law and Founding-era understandings in an attempt to influence current doctrine on the ground.

This short Essay commenting on Professor Wuerth's article does three things. First, it describes the topic's significance, and explains why future discussion on the procedural rights of foreign states and state-owned enterprises is worthwhile. The issues are increasingly important given the rise of state-owned enterprises as major players in the global economy and as the amount of transnational regulation—untethered to international agreement—continues to grow, while the doctrine of foreign sovereign immunity appears to narrow. Second, it situates Professor Wuerth's article within a broader conversation. While a dearth of literature addresses the rights of foreign states, the literature that does exist intersects with other important strands of scholarship related to global governance and transnational regulation, as well as a renewed interest in how the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause applies to foreign entities. Lastly, the Essay makes some brief observations on the substance of Professor Wuerth's claims.

I am more skeptical than Professor Wuerth about locating the sovereign rights of foreign states in constitutional doctrine, and I am more sanguine that courts will take her up on her invitation to embrace more original understandings derived from international law. In other contexts, constitutional limitations generally do not apply to foreigners. While her article resolves one inconsistency—the treatment of foreign states as compared to foreign corporations when it comes to procedural rights—it reveals other inconsistencies. And in many ways, the protections that Professor Wuerth seeks to have recognized already exist under established international law. That said, Professor Wuerth is undoubtedly right that the basic structural limitations of our international system related to sovereign authority were well-understood at the Founding.⁴ To the extent that U.S. courts overlook or fail to engage with international law's limitations on state power, locating the basic structural limitations of the international system in our constitutional system may be prudent.

I. A GROWING IMPORTANCE

Professor Wuerth's article comes at an important time, both as the amount of litigation involving foreign states has grown and as the number and size of state-owned enterprises continues to expand too. Changes in how courts apply foreign sovereign immunity, and legislative willingness to extend judicial power broadly, mean that the constitutional limits on judicial power are likely to assume greater importance. Below, I highlight a few points that Professor Wuerth addresses only briefly.

A. The Rise of State-Owned Enterprises

Appreciating the rise of state-owned enterprises is key to understanding the stakes involved. State-owned enterprises are an increasingly important part of the global economy and play an important role in cross-border interactions.⁵ Many of the world's largest companies are state-owned.⁶ Not only is there a growing number of state-owned enterprises, but in certain sectors state-owned enterprises are the largest companies in the sector.⁷ They are also the fastest growing.⁸

The size and impact are staggering. In 2013, one analysis described just how significant the holdings of state-owned enterprises have become:

The combined sales of these [state-owned enterprises] amounted to USD 3.6 trillion, representing more than 10% of the aggregate sales of the 2,000 [world's] largest companies, and exceeding the 2010 [gross national income] of countries like the United Kingdom, France or Germany. The value of sales of these [state-owned enterprises] was tantamount to almost 6% of world [gross domestic product] Their market value corresponded to 11% of the market capitalisation of all listed companies worldwide⁹

They originated from 37 different countries with China leading the list (70 SOEs), followed by India (30), Russia and the United Arab Emirates (9 each) and Malaysia (8).").

By 2017, the assets of Chinese state-owned enterprises had grown to over USD 10.4 trillion.¹⁰ That same year, profit of Chinese state-owned enterprises was estimated to exceed USD 453 billion.¹¹

The increasing market power and influence of state-owned enterprises—after a period of decline—is now well documented.¹² From 2005 to 2012, “nine of the 15 largest initial public offerings” involved state-owned enterprises.¹³ And some level of state-ownership appears to assist in the international expansion of firms.¹⁴ For the BRICS, the significance of state-owned enterprises is even greater,¹⁵ particularly in China.¹⁶ Given China’s increasing power in the global economy, we can expect state-owned enterprises to continue to play an important role in global markets.¹⁷

B. Unilateral Global Regulation

The growing global prominence of state-owned enterprises is, however, only part of the story. Foreign governments play a prominent role in transnational litigation in other ways. Foreign governments have filed cases in U.S. courts as plaintiffs.¹⁸ And foreign governments increasingly participate in U.S. litigation through amicus brief submissions.¹⁹ It is not uncommon now for U.S. courts to address issues involving foreign nations.²⁰ And, as Professor Wuerth describes, changes in the doctrine related to foreign sovereign immunity increasingly mean that foreign nations are viable defendants for U.S. actions.²¹ That is particularly true after the dramatic expansion of laws post-September 11, which permitted U.S. citizens to file claims against foreign governments that had allegedly materially supported terrorist acts.²² Somewhat along a similar vein, investor-state dispute settlement cases have increased in recent decades, as foreign states are challenged by foreign investors before international arbitration tribunals.²³

These phenomena are not surprising given the United States' withdrawal from some certain forms of international collaboration and the dramatic growth of unilateral regulatory action, where the United States (and now other countries) use domestic law to address global challenges that once were the domain of international law and international relations.²⁴ To the extent that domestic law is projected abroad to govern global activities, the likelihood of conflict increases. A number of commentators have described how cross-border, transnational litigation is common,²⁵ and the practice, for good or for bad, of global forum shopping has become more prevalent.²⁶

Another phenomenon suggests that the questions raised by Professor Wuerth will continue to be salient. While the Supreme Court has indicated its unwillingness to hastily assume that Congress has intended to regulate foreigners for their conduct in foreign countries, Congress continues to pass a significant number of laws that seek to reach foreign conduct untethered from international agreement. Once mostly limited to the area of antitrust and securities regulation, where gaps in global regulation existed, now a wide-range of domestic laws purport to address foreign conduct.²⁷ Also, as law firms with large global practices compete with one another for transnational cases, one can expect litigation to be an increasingly significant way for foreign nations to engage with one another.²⁸ Separate from this, continued state-supported terrorism, wide-spread reports of foreign interference with elections, and foreign state-directed cyber-attacks²⁹ mean that courts are called upon to resolve claims against foreign nations. Given this, as Professor Wuerth correctly notes, one can expect cases involving foreign nations to continue to have a prominent place in U.S. litigation.³⁰

C. A Broader Context

Over the last few years, three strands of scholarship have been prominent at the intersection of international law and foreign relations, to which Professor Wuerth's piece is related.

The first is a renewed interest in the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause and the limitations it imposes on exercising judicial jurisdiction over foreigners. Driven by recent decisions that curtail the jurisdiction of state courts under the Fourteenth Amendment, a number of commentators have sought to deploy a national-contacts approach under the Fifth Amendment to expand jurisdiction over foreign activity.³¹ The number of scholars focused on the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause's limitations on personal jurisdiction has increased because the Supreme Court has reserved addressing the issue of what restraints emanate from the Fifth Amendment (as opposed to the Fourteenth Amendment)³² and because the Court, in a series of decisions, has arguably narrowed the scope of personal jurisdiction.³³ While Professor Wuerth's article is one of the few that explores Fifth Amendment Due Process limitations on foreign nations,³⁴ it is an important addition to this burgeoning literature.

Second is the long-standing literature focused on the constitutional rights of foreigners—separate from concerns related to personal jurisdiction.³⁵ A vast amount of scholarship has addressed what constitutional rights, if any, foreigners hold outside the United States.³⁶ That literature continues to be important in a range of contexts.³⁷ Related is the literature addressing whether the U.S. Constitution requires adherence with international law.³⁸

And finally, continued interest exists in the growing area of extraterritoriality and transnational law, which has become its own defined area of study.³⁹ To the extent that Professor Wuerth's article suggests some limitation on when U.S. courts may be used to achieve what previously would have been the purview of international law and diplomacy, Professor Wuerth provides an important balm to the dramatic growth of extraterritorial laws and the willingness of powerful nations to ignore limits on sovereign authority.⁴⁰

II. INTERNATIONAL LAW AND CONSTRAINING SOVEREIGN OVERREACH

Traditionally, international law—not constitutional law—has provided the answers to basic questions related to the procedural rights afforded to states. While there are good reasons to examine how much the U.S. Constitution incorporates international law norms,⁴¹ many of the procedural protections Professor Wuerth describes (for example the jurisdictional protections afforded foreign states) already exist by virtue of international law.

International law restricts a state's exercise of power over people and activities in other states with which the state has no connection.⁴² Derived from long-standing requirements of sovereign equality, self-determination, and non-intervention,⁴³ public international law and the international law of jurisdiction⁴⁴ often restrain states from regulating or intervening in the affairs of foreign states.⁴⁵ States have the right to develop their own economic, social, and cultural systems in the way they see fit (absent doing so in a way that harms others or violates basic human rights norms). The purpose of these rules is to reduce conflict and promote international peace.⁴⁶ Other international legal principles, such as the principles of good neighborliness,⁴⁷ the duty to cooperate,⁴⁸ and the no-harm rule,⁴⁹ give meaning to these jurisdictional limitations on sovereign power.

As Professor Wuerth describes, these international law limitations on sovereign authority were well-understood at the Founding.⁵⁰ U.S. states were equated to foreign states, with the question being how much sovereignty remained after ratification of the Constitution. And, at least for personal jurisdiction, the international laws of jurisdiction were given effect through the Due Process Clause. In the landmark Pennoyer v. Neff decision,⁵¹ a violation of international law principles related to jurisdiction (then tightly tied to territory) resulted in a Fourteenth Amendment violation.⁵² As various scholars have described, jurisdictional doctrine in the United States drew from international law,⁵³ and even the modern test of minimum contacts originated in international law.⁵⁴ While the early cases addressed Fourteenth Amendment protections for inter-state actions, and sovereign immunity meant claims against foreign states did not often arise, it was clear that jurisdictional power was limited by international law.⁵⁵ It may be true, as Professor Wuerth describes in some depth, that a defect in “process” would leave a court without a case, and hence without judicial power.⁵⁶ But more simply, it was that the United States understood the well-established international law principles that limited sovereign power. This was less a “right” of the foreign state, but instead a structural limitation on U.S. (or any state’s) power.⁵⁷

In the past, there was little need to consider litigation-related procedural protections embedded in the Constitution. Even putting aside immunity doctrines, disputes between foreign states would generally be resolved through diplomatic negotiation and international agreement, not through litigation.⁵⁸ And when court proceedings did occur, they were international in nature. The famous Trail Smelter Arbitration is a classic example of this approach, where Canada and the United States resolved their cross-border disagreements through international agreement and arbitration.⁵⁹

III. THE BROADER IMPLICATIONS

The above has attempted to situate Professor Wuerth's work in the broader conversation about transnational and international law, and to underscore its significance. This final Part expresses some skepticism over Professor Wuerth's approach, while explaining how, ultimately, the main thrust of her argument—that U.S. courts face limits on their judicial power, regardless of the immunity doctrines—is correct.

A. Potential Downsides

As an initial matter, it is unclear that locating rights of foreign nations in the U.S. Constitution would be a positive development, at least from a policy perspective. First, in the past, constitutional doctrine has often made it more difficult to enter into international agreements that would clarify and better allocate jurisdiction between states.⁶⁰ The collapse and stalled negotiation of the Hague Judgments Convention in the 1990s is just one example where U.S. constitutional doctrine rendered international agreement out of reach.⁶¹ To the extent U.S. constitutional doctrine diverges from international law, the ability to enter international judgment and jurisdictional treaties will likely be frustrated. Second, many of the concerns that Professor Wuerth raises could be corrected legislatively through statutory changes. When foreign states and their enterprises are not entitled to immunity, Congress could choose to afford those states the same protections afforded private citizens.⁶² That symmetry could be achieved through amendment of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, which would obviate the need to address the more challenging and thornier constitutional questions. For the reasons set forth by Professor Wuerth, Congress should have some interest in closing this gap.

A broader pragmatic concern also exists. Recently, some U.S. scholars have re-envisioned international law to suggest that some of the core structural limitations no longer apply.⁶³ It is a tendentious position that is

As Professor Damrosch argued: “[s]ymmetry and sound policy suggest that [foreign states] should likewise enjoy the judicially implemented rights and protections available to private parties in connection with commercial and financial activities.” Damrosch, supra note 2, at 497.

63. For one prominent example, see RESTATEMENT (FOURTH) OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS LAW OF THE UNITED STATES: JURISDICTION § 302, intro. note (AM. LAW INST. 2018) (finding that “[w]ith the exception of sovereign immunity, modern customary international law generally does not impose limits on jurisdiction to adjudicate”). For an explanation for why the Fourth Restatement is incorrect and inconsistent with established understandings of contrary to long-established understandings of public international law. It also creates a new standard for determining customary law that, if accepted, would potentially eliminate wide swaths of established law. If this attempt and others to further marginalize international law is successful,⁶⁴ however, finding that limits exist in the Constitution would put the U.S. at a comparative disadvantage. When the constitutional and international law limits align, as they did in Pennoyer and earlier cases, they are mutually reinforcing. But if there exists only a constitutional right, it provides a one-way check on state power (limiting U.S. action under U.S. constitutional principles, but not providing a similar check on foreign states exercising power over U.S. interests, in states that may not have similar domestic law restraints). Unlike constitutional law, international jurisdictional law constrains, in principle, the power of all states. Traditionally the U.S. sought to develop international law in a way that was consistent with U.S. law limitations precisely for this reason.

Lastly, it is unclear how far the historical and textual analysis takes us. In the Founding era personal jurisdiction was limited by the territorial limits of international law. Those principles, articulated most famously by Pennoyer, were jettisoned not only in the state-to-state context,⁶⁵ but also in the foreign defendant context.⁶⁶ This is then not to disagree with Professor Wuerth on her history, but to question its continuing relevance. In other words, Professor Wuerth is not the first to advocate for a return to first principles, without much traction in the U.S. Supreme Court.⁶⁷ It is true that from time to time, some members of the Court have indicated a willingness to use history and text to return to earlier doctrine.⁶⁸ But usually the historical approach has been used as a way to reinforce longstanding practice, not to depart from it. And it may be that the Court's more recent pronouncements are best understood as a rejection of the legal realism and fairness approaches to jurisdiction articulated most famously by Justice Brennan in the 1970s and 1980s or an attempt at tort reform, rather than any true willingness to fully revisit modern jurisdiction doctrine.

B. Other Considerations

Ultimately, in many ways my preferred approach is not all that different from Professor Wuerth's. If the question is whether state power is limited, the answer seems clear under established international law principles. If the U.S. Constitution embeds those international law principles substantively, then perhaps, despite the pragmatic difficulties described above, that is fine. In an article written in the mid-2000s, while I highlighted the doctrinal inconsistencies with finding that due process protections apply to foreign defendants, I took the position that procedural protections should apply as a result of sovereignty and international comity.⁶⁹ Those sovereignty-based imperatives are even stronger when foreign nations are involved.

The Supreme Court also seems cognizant and receptive again to the idea that the U.S. Constitution embodies the sovereignty principles inherent in the structure of the international legal system. Just this year in Gamble v. United States, the Court reaffirmed the importance of sovereignty in both the domestic and foreign contexts in a Fifth Amendment case.⁷⁰ And in the personal jurisdiction realm, the Court has reaffirmed in the foreign context that sovereignty concerns loom large.⁷¹

Still, while Professor Wuerth points to history and text to suggest that foreign states are "persons," she does not fully respond to the broader conceptual issue.⁷² As Professor Damrosch highlighted in her famous piece: "[t]o the extent that the Constitution is a social contract establishing a system of self-government, permanent outsiders . . . seem to have little claim to invoke constitutional 'rights.'"⁷³ That seems to hold more force for foreign nations. So while there is a logic to saying that if foreign citizens are entitled to due process protections so too should foreign states be, it is not entirely clear why foreign citizens are protected by virtue of constitutional doctrine (rather than international law).⁷⁴ As others have argued, generally the

CONCLUSION

Professor Wuerth’s article on the due process rights of foreign nations raises important question that will likely remain important as litigation involving foreign states in the United States continues. While she may be correct as a matter of history and text, why foreign nations today would have constitutional rights rather than litigation-related protections under international law remains unclear. Nevertheless, if Professor Wuerth’s suggested approach helps courts more closely examine and more cautiously assert power over foreign defendants and foreign states, it may well, on balance, be a welcome development.
