Immigration Project

I. INTRODUCTION

The Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies is pleased to announce the publication of the first annual Immigration Project. Every Fall, the Journal will publish a series of papers documenting important developments and trends in international immigration law. Most of the papers in the Immigration Project are only intended to create a point of reference for further research and scholarship. Each Immigration Project, however, will also provide an in-depth analysis for one or two topics which we believe merit special consideration.

II. IN THIS ISSUE

In this issue, Immigration and the Crisis in Federalism examines how immigration issues in both the United States and Canada present unique challenges for their federalist systems. Countdown to 1997 addresses the wave of emigration from Hong Kong by residents fearing the looming Chinese takeover of Hong Kong in 1997. The article also examines the response of various immigrant-receiving countries that have tailored their immigration laws to attract these often highly-skilled immigrants from Hong Kong.

The New Slave Trade examines the worldwide crisis in immigrant smuggling. Since restrictive immigration policies in the West often exacerbate smuggling problems, the need for a strong response from the international community is also addressed. The current trend towards tighter restrictions on immigration in the West also illustrates the growing importance of immigration as a political issue. The Politics of Western Immigration examines immigration as a powerful political issue in the context of this trend. The article focuses especially on the role that political rhetoric, critical of immigration and immigrants, is playing in recent elections in the West.
