This Week in the Law School

Monday, January 26

In what one can only assume will be a hot and steamy talk, Starbucks' director and expert senior counsel Batur Oktay will remote in to the first IP practitioner-in-residence talk on Tuesday. No word on whether coffee will be provided. If you "need room," plenty will be available.

As Super Bowl XLIX approaches, inflate your chances of securing a job by attending one of several Career Choices series this week. Sessions will be held focusing on government and international options. If those don't work out, the Patriots might have a few openings in the ball department.

ILA's Super Bowl pick: Patriots take the air out of Seattle, 34-21; new crime series "PSI: New England" to investigate.

Monday, January 26

Public Interest Roundtables

Faculty News
Three hours after the Supreme Court granted cert in the marriage equality cases two Fridays ago, Professor Steve Sanders published an invited essay on SCOTUSblog arguing that the marriage bans represent a form of unconstitutional animus. The post got more than 10,000 page views. The next day, he published an essay on the American Constitution Society Blog, later adapted for the Huffington Post, discussing speculation about why the Court asked parties to address marriage licensing and recognition as separate constitutional questions. It was Professor Sanders' scholarship that first argued that non-recognition of same-sex marriages -- what he called a violation of the "right to remain married" -- was a 14th Amendment question independent of the right to get married. His blog posts were cited and discussed by the Washington Post and on TheAtlantic.com and Volokh Conspiracy, among others.
