Winter 2001

A Saturday with Herman B Wells

Douglass Boshkoff
Indiana University Maurer School of Law

Follow this and additional works at: http://www.repository.law.indiana.edu/ilj
Part of the Legal Biography Commons, and the Legal Education Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://www.repository.law.indiana.edu/ilj/vol76/iss1/15
In taking the steps required to remove those reprehensible, discriminatory rules, we tried to make a move if possible when the issue was not being violently discussed pro and con on the campus. I felt that making the moves in this manner would, and in fact it did, prevent backlash that might set the whole program back. For example, one of the earliest steps we took was to remove the reserved signs from certain tables in the Commons. Everyone knew that these reserved signs on the tables meant that the Black students were to sit there. One afternoon when the place was deserted, James Patrick, then manager of the Union Building, went with me to the Commons to look the situation over. I turned to him and said, "Pat, I want you to remove all those signs. Do it unobtrusively and make no mention of what you've done." He followed my instructions explicitly. It was two weeks before anyone discovered the fact that the signs were gone[,] and then, of course, the absurdity of the previous situation was apparent.9

Wells was deeply committed to making the treasures of the university available to all students without discrimination. He had the ability to imagine a world different than the one in which he lived and the courage to change it. It is easy to underestimate such courage because, in retrospect, such decisions now seem so obviously correct. At the time, however, such actions are seldom clear. Someone must have the courage to speak out first and take effective action. When you look at Wells's actions, the success of the causes he supported was not inevitable; he seems to have chosen his own path from a deep, personal understanding of the research university's role in a just society—and so we come full circle. The thread that pulls Herman Wells's stories together is his commitment to discovery, to the production of new knowledge, and to sharing this knowledge with "new knowers." He did this with imagination, courage, and humanity.

I came to know Herman Wells late in his life, when he was confined to a wheelchair and was hard of hearing. I did not know him well, but I did know him well enough to believe in this man's legend. Despite his age and disabilities, his interest in people and ideas and the celebration of the ideals of research and Indiana University were always apparent. His sparkle and humor were always in evidence, as was his zest for the kinds of gatherings that the law school organizes (like all the schools on campus) to celebrate its alumni and its hopes and goals as an institution. Herman Wells seldom missed an important event at our school—be it our sesquicentennial celebration, an endowed lecture by a distinguished faculty member, or an alumni gathering. His ability to connect on a human level no doubt gave many people a personal experience of a profound truth: Democracy depends on liberal universities' commitment to the quest for and the production of new knowledge, thorough research, teaching, and a diverse campus community.

A SATURDAY WITH HERMAN B WELLS

DOUGLAS G. BOSHKOFF

Herman B Wells retired as president of Indiana University a few months before I arrived on campus to join the law faculty. Accordingly, I have no firsthand information concerning his impact on the law school as university president.

7. Id. at 216.
 Robert H. McKinney Professor of Law Emeritus, Indiana University School of Law—Bloomington.
However, since he continued on as university chancellor until his death, I had numerous contacts with him in connection with fund-raising activities. One incident, I think, merits retelling, as it illustrates his courage and his dedication to university affairs.

Early in my deanship, I became aware of the fact that Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Long of Detroit, Michigan, were potentially very large donors to the law school. Ben, a highly successful lawyer, had not received his law degree from Indiana University, but for some reason he had become interested in our school. He was serving on our Board of Visitors and was also a member of the Board of Directors of the Indiana University Foundation. While I do not know the extent of Ben’s planned gift to this school, I believe it was well into seven figures. It was clearly the biggest promised bequest in the history of the school at that time, and Herman thought that it had the potential to affect the development of the school in a very significant fashion. Because of this, we did everything possible to strengthen the ties between the Longs and the school. An event totally beyond our control, however, soon caused the Longs to turn away from us.

The early 1970s, during which I served as Dean, were not happy times in Bloomington. There was a great deal of unrest on campus which manifested itself in various ways. One outburst of protest was prompted by the announcement that Ben and his wife planned to give a modest amount of money for gates at the entrance to the campus where the Sample Gates now stand. As soon as the proposed gift was announced, the Longs began receiving letters—some quite menacing in their view—demanding that the gate project be abandoned and the funds devoted to other uses, such as student scholarships and raises for university staff. The impact on the Longs was immediate and dramatic. The gate project was abandoned. Ben resigned his membership on the Board of Visitors and refused to continue as an Indiana University Foundation board member. He cut off all contacts with us and redirected the law school gift to another institution. Despite numerous efforts, Herman and I were unsuccessful in reestablishing a good relationship with the Longs. The only time I saw Herman in a depressed and discouraged state was the day he told me the Longs had changed their minds. He felt the loss of this gift very keenly.

A few years later, I heard that Ben had just died. Since he had severed his relationship with us, I assumed that any formal expression of sympathy was unnecessary and, perhaps, even inappropriate. The following Saturday morning, I was working in the garden when I was called to the telephone. It was Herman. He told me that this was the day of the Long funeral in Logansport. Did I plan to go? I had not even considered that possibility, but Herman saw things differently. Just because we had been unlucky was no reason to stay away. We had an obligation to attend. He was going and wanted me to accompany him. He said that his driver would be over to pick me up shortly and we would drive up together. I wasn’t very enthusiastic about this suggestion, but Herman was insistent. So, I joined him on the journey to Logansport.

The funeral was in the afternoon. We arrived early, and Herman introduced me to many of those attending. He seemed to know almost everyone. After the funeral, we attended a buffet for out-of-town guests. Once again, Herman seemed to have a good word for everyone. He acted as if the Longs were still the best friends of Indiana University. But, on the return trip to Bloomington he was uncharacteristically quiet. We rode home in silence.

What is unusual about this day? I am sure that Herman must have attended other funerals of potential donors who changed their minds about giving to Indiana University—not an easy task, but a manageable one. However, this was Herman’s second funeral in a week. The Saturday before he had attended the funeral of his mother, who had lived well into her nineties. Attending a second funeral under these circumstances must have been a terribly painful experience. Nonetheless, he was able to put his grief aside and honor someone who had turned his back on Indiana University. I shall always admire the way he found the strength to act so graciously. It was a remarkable performance by a remarkable man.